

As a United Airlines flight attendant, my only concern with cell phone use in-flight is the potential noise and disturbance from loud conversations, but that's not the concern of the FCC. Some people have commented on the possibility of terrorists using cell phones to coordinate an attack on planes, but that's Homeland Security's concern. As long as proper testing is done with regards to interference with avionics, I have no problem with cell phone use. Airlines can make their own restrictions with regard to ring tones and loud conversations. The current restrictions on cell use are outdated, and it's time they are brought up-to-date with current technology.
